English Doctrine of Ancient Lights. "Ancient lights" is an English doctrine. It states that if a landowner had received sunlight across adjoining property for a particular period of time, that landowner was entitled to continue to receive unobstructed access to sunlight across the adjoining property. According to this doctrine, the landowner acquired a prescriptive easement and could not be prevented from access to light.

English Doctrine of Ancient Lights - Adjoining Landowners

The Ancient Lights were peace-obsessed energy entities which were able to disobey the physical laws of the universe using the power of astrology. They also used the power to channel their own power into other lifeforms, giving those individuals abilities while also controlling them. Luke Smith speculated that the Ancient Lights originated from before the universe. Martin Trueman said that the ...

Ancient lights, in English property law, the right of a building or house owner to the light received from and through his windows. Windows used for light by an owner for 20 years or more could not be obstructed by the erection of an edifice or by any other act by an adjacent landowner. This rule of law originated in England in 1663, based on the theory that a landowner acquired an easement to the light by virtue of his use of the windows for that purpose for the statutory length of time.

It is unfortunate that archaeological findings and written documents hardly shed sufficient light upon education among the Maya, Aztecs, and Incas. But from available documents it is evident that these pre-Columbian civilizations developed formal education for training the nobility and priests. The major purposes of education were cultural conservation, vocational training, moral and character training, and control of cultural deviation.
